A related point here is that the main advances in Roman history in general, and Roman Britain in general, are due to archaeology and the numerous findings that have been discovered. However, even in Britain, where archaeology started earlier than in most places and where there is still some much to find, there are limits to the information it can provide.

For nearly four centuries, from AD 43 to 410, Britain was a small province on the north-western edge of the vast Roman Empire. Though it was small, it was not insignificant. There were more Roman soldiers in Britain than there were in the provinces of North Africa, and the governors who were appointed by the Emperor were among the most prominent men of their day, at the peak of their careers.
